BLACK TEA

It is proven that black tea has incredible properties. In fact, if consumed regularly, it helps maintaining good general body health. In particular, it is good for bones, heart and teeth. The properties of black tea are primarily related to flavonoids, substances known to be antioxidants. The fluoride present in black tea protects against plaque and tooth decay. Other valuable properties of black tea can promote bone mineral density, especially in women. Finally, black tea helps to slow the progression of Alzheimer's disease and helps fight colds, raising the immune system.

The buds of the leaves and the young leaves of green tea contain the highest percentage of antioxidant principles that can be found in nature, useful to contrast the formation of free radicals, responsible for cellular aging. The antioxidant action is mainly given by the flavonoids, which contribute to support cardiac functions and to maintain a good health; these substances also reduce the levels of LDL cholesterol and triglycerides. It is also very useful to contrast the negative effects of smoking. Regular consumption of green tea has been shown to contrast the loss of cognitive abilities and help prevent the onset of Parkinson's disease and Alzheimer's syndrome. Another interesting property ascribed to green tea is the slimming one, since it is able to reduce the absorption of sugars and to favor the elimination of fats. The consumption of green tea is also useful in reducing the risk of hypertension. Finally, the high percentage of fluorine allows the mineralization of the skeleton and tooth enamel.

GREEN TEA

RED TEA

Rooibos is commonly known as African red tea, it is an intense red infusion with a delicate fruity taste and a refreshing herbal consistency. In addition to theine and caffeine, red tea is also lacking in oxalic acid, and is therefore excellent for those who suffer from kidney stones. The benefits of this tea are due to the high presence of mineral salts; moreover, it has a high polyphenol content, with anti-inflammatory, antiviral, antimutagen and antioxidant properties.

Our precious and exclusive selection of infusions and herbal teas dedicated to the psycho-physical wellness of our customers contains all the properties: relaxing of verbena, lemon balm, lavender, chamomile and mallow; draining and regularizing of birch and horsetail; slimming, thanks to mint, ginger, hibiscus and green tea extracts; depurative of fennel, star anise and rose petals; finally, balsamic, thanks to the action of eucalyptus.
